

Policeman's Complaint

To the Editor:

Sir—As police officers, in addition to our regular duties, we are expected to be lawyers, doctors, marriage counselors, arbitrators, all of which are in reason. But our latest requirement, according to Daniel Anthony, is not within reason, and that is to be heartless, void of all human feelings.

The police officers of this city, their wives, children, families and friends, have been subjects of undue criticism and controversy, held up to public ridicule, have had their motives and integrity questioned, by people like Mr. Anthony and others.

When we voice our objections to these charges in Mr. Anthony's presence and rise in defense of ourselves and our profession, we are told by Mr. Anthony, that we are "emotional," and fail to settle these problems "rationally."
